Gunmen Kill 13 in Restive Southern Region of Senegal

DAKAR, Senegal — Gunmen in Senegal on Saturday killed at least 13 people who were gathering firewood in the forest, the military said. It was the worst attack in years in the restive Casamance region in the country's south, where a separatist insurgency has dragged on for more than three decades.

The deaths led to fears of renewed unrest in the area, which had been relatively calm for the last several years. Col. Abdoul Ndiaye said late Saturday that seven others were wounded in the attack, which happened four miles outside the town of Ziguinchor. The military said it had stepped up its presence near the town. Casamance is separated from the rest of Senegal by the nation of Gambia. There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack.

The Movement of Democratic Forces of Casamance, a separatist group that operates in the region, began fighting for independence in 1982. The armed wing of the group agreed to a cease-fire in 2014, and the last major attack blamed on the group was in 2013 when rebels took 12 employees of a South African bomb disposal firm hostage. The victims, all Senegalese citizens, were eventually released. Saturday's deaths came just hours after the release of two prisoners belonging to the separatist group, following negotiations that were mediated by the Community of Sant'Egidio.

The separatists have long argued that their region is culturally distinct from the rest of Senegal, and has suffered from inattentive governments in the country's capital, Dakar.
